Canadian Constitutional Law

SCOPE OF THE COURSE

Constitutional law is distinguished by what it does (it creates the organs of the state and defines and limits their powers) and by its status (it is the supreme law with which all other laws and government actions must comply). The goal of this course is to provide candidates with an introduction to the various components of Canadian constitutional law, and to the basic principles necessary to understanding and applying the provisions of the constitution in legal practice.

The readings begin, in Part I of the course, with an introduction to the nature and sources of the Canadian constitution, followed by an overview of the procedures for amending the constitution, and an introduction to the federal nature of the state and the role of the judiciary in upholding the federal division of legislative powers.

In Part II, the readings explore the federal division of legislative power in sections 91-95 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in more detail. The readings on federalism begin with an examination of the general principles of interpretation, and then turn to a study of a handful of the most important legislative powers, including the federal powers in relation to "peace, order and good government" [opening language of s.91], "trade and commerce" [s.91(2)], "criminal law" [s.91(27)], and the provincial power in relation to "property and civil rights" [s.92(13)].

In Part III of the course, the readings examine the rights and freedoms protected by the Canadian constitution, including the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the 1982 Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The readings in Part III begin with an examination of the language rights protected by the Constitution Act, 1867, the Charter, and the Manitoba Act. The next topic is the distinct constitutional position of Aboriginal peoples. The readings examine federal and provincial powers to pass laws in relation to Aboriginal peoples and lands, and the Aboriginal and treaty rights entrenched in s.35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The readings then focus on four of the most important rights-conferring provisions of the Charter – freedom of conscience and religion [s.2(a)], freedom of expression [s.2(b)], life, liberty and security of the person [s.7] and equality rights [s.15] – as well as the provisions dealing with the application of the Charter [s.32], reasonable limits [s.1], the notwithstanding clause [s.33] and remedies [s.24, s.52].

EXAMINATION

The examination for this course will be a three-hour open book examination. The exam in the course may consist only of problem questions, or it may consist of a mix of problem questions, short answer questions and short essay questions.

A typical problem question will describe an actual or fictional statute (or other government action), and ask candidates to assess whether it is consistent with the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 and/or the Constitution Act, 1982, and, if not, what the consequences are likely to be. Problem questions test candidates' ability to identify constitutional issues, accurately state the applicable legal rules, apply those rules to novel situations, and draw conclusions supported by analysis. In other words, problem questions require the exercise of independent judgment grounded in the application of general rules to specific fact situations. For candidates who lack experience writing such exam questions, familiarizing yourself with them through practice is essential. Candidates should practice by testing themselves, using the sample examination and perhaps by reviewing other samples of recent Canadian constitutional law examinations. Many Canadian law school libraries have copies of recent exams on file. In addition, some Canadian constitutional law professors have course websites with sample examinations and model answers.

Short answer questions, which may be in a true/false format, test candidates' ability to succinctly and correctly evaluate statements about the content of Canadian constitutional law, as in the following example:

Question: Indicate whether the following statement is true or false, and cite the case listed on the syllabus that best supports your answer: Pursuant to the "general regulation of trade" branch of its power to enact laws in relation to trade and commerce in s.91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Parliament may enact a comprehensive regulatory scheme aimed at promoting fair competition in intraprovincial and interprovincial trade.

Answer: True. Relevant case listed on the syllabus: General Motors v. City National Leasing.

Federation of Law Societies of Canada National Committee on Accreditation

Short essay questions test whether candidates' have critically engaged with the material listed in the syllabus and have started to form their own opinions about the strengths and weaknesses of Canadian constitutional law (e.g.: "Would you favour the repeal of s.33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?").

REQUIRED READINGS

The required readings under each topic consist of the applicable provisions of the text of the constitution, leading cases from the Supreme Court of Canada (and a few from other courts), and relevant chapters (or parts of chapters) from the leading English-language textbook on Canadian constitutional law: Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada Student Edition (Toronto: Carswell, published in a revised version annually) (this edition is referred to below as "Hogg").

The case law you are required to read is accessible in case reporters in law libraries – for example, Supreme Court of Canada rulings are reported in the Canadian Supreme Court Reports (S.C.R.). You may access the full text of all court rulings listed below at <http://scc.lexum.org> (for Supreme Court of Canada judgments), or at <http://canlii.org> (for other Canadian court rulings), or at <http://www.bailii.org/uk/cases/UKPC/> (for Privy Council rulings). All of the court rulings listed in the required readings below are hyperlinked to the full text available online.

I recommend that candidates purchase a copy of the 2011 student edition of Professor Hogg's book. The student edition contains all of the chapters from the Hogg book included in the required readings below. Professor Hogg's book is also available in law libraries in a looseleaf format updated annually. Candidates are advised to use the most recent student edition of the Hogg book (or the looseleaf version) when completing the readings below, because it will contain the most up-to-date analysis of recent developments. Using a Hogg student edition from 2009 or 2010 is also acceptable, since the content of Canadian constitutional law, and thus of the Hogg textbook, does not change dramatically in a year or two. Using the Hogg student edition that is more than a few years old is not advisable, as you will be missing too many significant new developments in the case law.

Candidates should make regular reference to the texts of Canadian constitutional documents relevant to the topics covered in this course, especially the provisions of the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982 that are included on the list of required readings below. The key provisions are excerpted in Appendices I and III of the Hogg textbook. The full text of the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982 can also be found on the Department of Justice website at <http://laws-lois.justice.gc.ca/eng/Const/index.html> and on the website of the Canadian Legal Information Institute at <http://www.canlii.org>. For those who are interested in purchasing a separate volume containing a more comprehensive collection of constitutional documents (it is not necessary to do so), the best volume is B.W. Funston and E. Meehan, Canadian Constitutional Documents Consolidated 2d ed. (Carswell, 2007). The Department of Justice also publishes a handy volume entitled A Consolidation of the Constitution Acts 1867 to 1982, available for purchase online at <http://www.fedpubs.com/subject/constitution/constitutions.htm>.

Candidates should aim to develop an understanding of the basic principles of Canadian constitutional law that starts with the text of the Constitution Acts and is then deepened and extended by the principles developed through judicial interpretation of the text evident in the leading cases listed on the syllabus.

The Hogg textbook should serve to provide historical context and clear summaries of the law. Candidates are warned against focusing their study exclusively on the readings from the Hogg textbook. While the Hogg book is a marvellous source, it is important to give equal time to the study of the constitutional provisions and the leading judicial decisions listed on the syllabus. The listed cases are leading cases that set out authoritative statements of the content of Canadian constitutional law. The law cannot be derived from a study of the text of the constitution and the Hogg book alone.

Federation of Law Societies of Canada National Committee on Accreditation

In light of the sparse language of the constitutional text, the bulk of Canadian constitutional law is a product of judicial interpretation set out in the reasons in particular cases or references. Professor Hogg's book provides reliable summaries of the legal rules emanating from Supreme Court of Canada decisions; your understanding then needs to be extended by a careful reading of the leading cases on each topic. Candidates should be alert to instances where Professor Hogg's views are at odds with judicial opinions or are incomplete because he has not yet updated his book to reflect the latest judicial rulings listed on the syllabus. For example, the 2011 student edition of the Hogg textbook reflects developments up to October 2010; it does not include the most recent rulings listed in the required readings below (such as the Assisted Human Reproduction Act Reference, issued in December 2010).

The exam will test knowledge derived from all three sources – from the constitutional provisions themselves, from the case law, and from the Hogg book. An adequate understanding of and capacity to work with Canadian constitutional law requires a knowledge base that is a combination of the constitutional text, the case law and scholarly analysis.

TOPICS TO BE COVERED AND REQUIRED READINGS

The outline that follows gives the full requirements of the course. All of the required readings are examinable. As described above, the course is divided into three parts: basic concepts, distribution of powers and rights and freedoms.

The references to the chapters in the Hogg textbook below use the chapter numbers from the latest student edition.
